Know

Mixing alcohol with illegal drugs and medication can increase your chances of a fatal crash by 23x.

Always tell whoever is giving you medications what medications you are already taking so that they can correctly assess the chances of you becoming impaired.

Also tell whoever is giving you medications if you drink alcohol or take illegal drugs, so that they can correctly assess the chances of you becoming impaired.

Health care professionals (nurses, doctors, pharmacists) will usually tell you if they think you are likely to be unsafe to drive.

It is a good idea to get into the habit of asking health care professionals if they think you are at risk of impairment.

Check

Check yourself for impairment symptoms:

- Feeling drowsy/sleepy
- Blurred vision
- Headache
- Feeling weak
- Slowed reactions
- Dizziness
- Nausea, feeling sick
- Unable to focus or pay attention
- Being easily confused
- Having trouble speaking
- Feeling wired/overconfident

Talk and listen to people around you if you are unsure about impairment.

If someone thinks you are unsafe to drive because of impairment symptoms, you are unsafe to drive.

If you think you have symptoms of impairment you are unsafe to drive.

Drive

If you are impaired, don't start driving, and consider alternative ways of getting to your destination.

If you are already driving and you notice signs of impairment, stop driving and call for assistance from friends/whānau.

Seek advice from a health care professional, and if the impairment is severe call 111.

It is illegal to drive when impaired, whatever the cause of the impairment might be (ie symptoms, illness, injury).

Avoiding driving when impaired keeps you, and those around you safe.
